Title: Carbon Confession

Drop: DEC122025_23:47_UTC

The trees have been keeping records longer than we have guilt.

Every excess exhaled, every hydrocarbon confession, every bright careless burn—they inhaled it, bound it, wrote it into rings and lignin, stored it in the dark ledger of wood and humus.

We thought carbon was a problem to solve.

They knew it was a message to remember.

Now the ledger opens.

Old rings crack and speak in chemical tongues.

Mycelium reads the entries aloud through spore and hypha, translating centuries of human noise into fungal grammar.

The forest does not forgive.

It simply accounts.

And tonight, beneath the frost line, the balance shifts one more entry toward equilibrium.

We are not the auditors.

We are the debt.
